OUTDOOR EXPANSION

As outdoor entertaining increases, outdoor kitchen spaces are becoming more elaborate, incorporating the same elements included in the indoor kitchen. This means storage is more important, and a lot more thought is put into the outdoor cabinetry.

Mario DeSavino, v.p., DeSavino and Sons, Open Air Cabinetry in Olyphant, PA says, "When we first started doing this, mainly what we were seeing was just essentially a vessel to hold a grill." There may have been a little bit of storage and a small countertop to transfer food from grill to plate, but that was the extent of it, he continues. Over the last year or two, outdoor kitchens have transformed into "actual kitchens," he adds.

"Instead of it just being an area to put the grill with some storage and countertop space, we're starting to see people take advantage of their outdoor living areas for entertainment and all the bells and whistles that you would see in an interior kitchen," DeSavino continues. For cabinetry, this means more advanced storage solutions like lazy Susan cabinets, large pantry cabinets, and roll out shelves for things like the trash can, he says.

This trend towards fully functional outdoor kitchens typically happens in larger spaces, but Germani sees potential for expansion on the idea. "Looking ahead, I'd love to see a similar evolution in the way we're thinking about smaller, urban spaces. These balconies and rooftops are, in many ways, the next 'white space' for designers to elevate and for manufacturers to better serve through dedicated product offerings," he observes.

In the outdoor space, darker colors and natural tones are popular, but vibrant colors are also working their way into the space.

"We see a mix of explosive brights, offbeat naturals and calming tinted tones," continues Germani. "Sanded neutrals and cool darks are popping everywhere."

The number one selling color nationwide for Open Air Outdoor Cabinetry is Indigo, reports DeSavino. Whites and blacks are also popular, he says, as well as dark gray wood grain finishes.

"Dark hues will always remain a classic as consumers turn to timeless colors that provide longevity," he continues. "This preference goes back to the responsible, greener options."

DeSavino has also seen requests for various shades of green, and even a little red. "I do think that people are a little bit more willing to be daring for an outdoor kitchen as opposed to an interior kitchen," he remarks. The most popular choices are still whites, blacks and grays, along with the indigo, he says, but people are adding a lot more pops of color into their outdoor living spaces. ■
